Placental alkaline phosphatase is essential for growth factor-induced migration of embryonic stem cells. Embryonic stem (ES) cells are unique in their ability to grow indefinitely in an undifferentiated state and maintain a normal karyotype. When under suitable culture conditions, ES cells differentiate and lose their unique properties, which is a critical step in the development of many tissues. We describe here a screen designed to identify genes necessary for the growth and/or differentiation of mouse ES cells. Using this screen, we have identified the enzyme placental alkaline phosphatase (PLAP), which is overexpressed in the differentiated state of ES cells. The differentiated phenotype of PLAP-deficient ES cells was restored by the expression of PLAP antisense constructs and, conversely, was blocked by the expression of PLAP. Moreover, we demonstrate that growth factors that promote differentiation of ES cells include leukemia inhibitory factor, granulocyte macrophage-colony-stimulating factor, and interleukin-1, and migration toward these growth factors is altered in PLAP-deficient ES cells. Taken together, our data demonstrate that PLAP is involved in ES cell growth and migration, suggesting that it may be an important factor for the regulation of both growth and differentiation of ES cells. Toxicity of a tamoxifen-based antiestrogenic drug: combination of in vivo and in silico data. Tamoxifen (TMX), a non-steroidal antiestrogen of the triphenylethylen e (TPE) family, is used in the treatment of estrogen-dependent tumors. The mechanism of its antiestrogenic action is based on the competitive binding of TMX to the estrogen receptor alpha (ERalpha). The binding of this compound to ERalpha causes receptor dimerization and subsequent activation of transcription factors or recruitment of co-factors. Recently, the structure-activity relationship study of a group of TPEs substituted with an aminoalkyl group at the 6 position of a phenol ring, has shown that these compounds exhibit a peculiar molecular interaction with the ERalpha and induce a different conformational rearrangement, resulting in a loss of activity and strong ERalpha-dependent toxicity. The study also revealed that a combination of in silico approaches, support the absence of ERalpha-mediated toxicity of one of these compounds in contrast to a toxicity often observed for TMX. Q: Does the reduction in accuracy of traditional L
