Degradation of azo dyes and phenolic compounds has been pursued in the presence of the photocatalytic action of hydroxyapatite nanoparticles and exfoliated graphene oxide. The starting materials for this study were the materials found in algae that can be used for the design of environmentally friendly bioinspired photocatalysts. The morphological, structural and optical properties of the materials were analyzed using X-ray diffraction (XRD), Fourier transform infrared spectroscopy (FTIR), Scanning electron microscopy (SEM) and UV-vis spectroscopy. The data show that nanosized hydroxyapatite and exfoliated graphene oxide materials have a photocatalytic activity that is higher than that of the corresponding bulk materials, with a complete color degradation of organic contaminants is discussed, since the material must adsorb the pollutant, nativate the pollutant molecule by electronic excitation, reduce the pollutant in the photocatalytic processes in the search for new materials with high efficiency for environmental cleanup.Range of motion and inter-osseous ligament on static stability of the first carpometacarpal (CMC) joint.
