* Use the Move tool to manipulate your image Your selection can be made by clicking and dragging on an area of your image, or you can simply click and drag inside the Selection tool. You can also drag it directly in any direction using the mouse. You can use the Transform tool to change the size, position, and angle of the image. You can use the Type tool to add text to your image, and use the Pen Tool to draw shapes and lines directly on your image. You can use the Free Transform tool to change the rotation of an object in your image. Brushes are one of the most important tools to have in Photoshop. They are your painting tool, allowing you to retouch images and add new elements to your original picture. In your toolbar you'll find the Brush tool and Settings, which allow you to customize your brushes. Brushes are made up of different parts. The tip looks like a twig and allows you to select an area that you want to paint with the brush. To paint with a brush, you simply click and drag it. The pressure is how hard you are pressing the mouse. In Photoshop a light pressure with your mouse means a slow stroke and a deep pressure means a fast stroke. A stroke reverses its direction when you lift your mouse off the mouse pad, and then it continues along the same path. The Flow works like a pressure pad. If you move your mouse on it and then release the mouse, the pen will keep going along the lines that you've already created. The Size allows you to work on the smallest level to the largest, and the Thickness can be set from thick to thin. Use the Zoom tool to increase or decrease the brush size. You can also increase or decrease the pressure. If you click the Zoom tool and choose the Brush tool in the menu, you can increase or decrease the pressure, just like you're doing it with the brush size. The brush effects can be found on the Settings tab.

Social Sharing Hearing back from Bell's legal team about how 'serious' the breach was Selcuk Oztunc Usta, a professor at Ryerson University in Toronto, was one of hundreds of thousands of people whose personal information was breached by Bell Mobility's servers. (Manuel Carrasquillo/CBC) Bell Canada has refused to pay for the storage of encrypted data belonging to hundreds of thousands of people whose personal information was breached. That information — including names, addresses, phone numbers, email addresses and financial data — includes details about the users' family members as well as personal information on people between the ages of 18 and 65. Bell has faced increasing criticism over the breach, including calls for the company to return the money to affected customers. Earlier this month, nearly 30 organizations and companies signed a letter calling for Bell to make good on its promise of free lifetime storage of personal information it had collected on customers. A few weeks later, Bell's lawyers went before a Montreal court — taking the unusual step of appearing in person — to ask a judge to reject a class-action lawsuit brought by dozens of affected Canadians, and to cancel any class actions or demands for monetary compensation. The request to set aside the lawsuit on grounds of jurisdictional issues was quickly granted by the Superior Court judge, essentially killing the class-action lawsuit. "It was a really bizarre and creepy situation," said Toronto lawyer Ralph Lean, who represents the class of affected Canadians in his firm's class actions practice. Bell's lawyer, John MacKinnon, told the court that while he had intended to walk into court with a neutral position, he ended up siding with his clients. "The issue is so fundamental that we wanted to ensure that the court got the complete picture as to why these people should not get their day in court," he said. (Submitted by Lean Law) Hearings to determine a compensation amount are expected in the near future. The company said earlier this month that customers affected by the breach might see a credit on their bill.
